According to the beliefs of the ancient Easter Islanders, the main god, Makemake, made the earth, the sun, the moon and the stars. He also was the creator of mankind (Métraux 1940:312, 314). Birdmen figures were features of the cult; frequently these are represented in the local rock art (Métraux 1940:314; Lee 1992:15, 22 ff), but it is also known that this mysterious deity was the great spirit of the sea (Thomson 1891:482). The god Tangaroa appeared at Easter Island incarnated in a seal, and his mana, supernatural power, was over the sea (Métraux 1940:310). These items state that Makemake is the Polynesian god Tangaroa, the Lord of the Ocean. Polynesian myths tell that, in the beginning, this god sat in a shell named Rumia, and then he went out of this small space and created the Universe (Buck 1938:69). The same story is presented in a kai kai chant (the text per Barthel 1962:848 and the translation per Rjabchikov 1995a:39):

<table>

<tr>
<th>E poie nui ni a tuki e</th>
<th>The Great Dawn — the Creator [lit. the Copulation] (dwelt)</th>

<tbody>
<tr>
<td>inua ia koe taau taau</td>
<td>in the Darkness Koe in the beginning for countless ages.</td>

<td>The Lord — the Shark (Seal); The Lord — the Shark (Seal).</td>
</tr>
<tr>

<td>Oh, the Tunny!2</td>

The combination of the three glyphs — 6-4-24 a atua ai 'the god (the location)' — sometimes introduces a deity's name or a place-name where this deity dwelt (Rjabchikov 1987b:3; 1994a: 23); moreover, this marker precedes a deity's name on the Tahiti fish tablet (Rjabchikov 1996a:38). The next words, 119 24 81-81, Kupenga-Ai-Manumanu ‘The Net-the Copulation-the Bird’, are similar to the Rapanui place-names Punu a kupenga a poie ‘To hatch out the Net-the Dawn’ and Kahi here ama ‘The Tunny-the Flower/Child/Net-the Clear Sky’. Besides, the names Punu and Makemake are interchangeable in the similar songs (Barthel 1962:850). Thus I conclude that Kupenga-Ai-Manumanu is another name of Tangaroa (Makemake). Mea Kahi ‘The Creator-the Tunny’ was the god of fishermen (Thomson 1891:533), and this name is an epithet of Tangaroa (Fedorova 1978:23, 356). A Rapanui legend (Métraux 1937:46) tells of Tangaroa and his brother who caught fish in a net. Interestingly, fish is a symbol of the god Tangaroa in the Maori mythology (Buck 1966:439). The Easter Islanders used the term Mea Ika (Mea Kahi) for the designation of the fish (tunny) god (Thomson 1891:537). One such image (Thomson 1891:Plate LI, Figure 4) contains the glyphs 64 Mea and 41 (h.)ere. In addition, a fish stone figurine contains the fish (tunny) glyph (Mellén Blanco 1986/1987:275).

The next words of the record, 11 4-6 5 6, Pakia tuhatuha ‘the time of Shark (Seal)’ describe the month’s name Tangaroa-uri ‘Tangaroa-progeny’ (October) when fishing was no longer prohibited.

The words, 25 22/64 16 44, Hua-Rapa-Mea Kahi-Taha ‘The Fruit-Shine-Mea Kahi-Frigate Bird’ are an integral characteristic of the solar god-creator Makemake.

The words, 146 12 2, ‘The new moon’, IKA (determinative) — Hina ‘The new moon, the constellation of the month Tangaroa-uri’ repeat the idea about the beginning of this month.

The words, 6 24 19-11 24 167 19-11, A ai Kie-Pakia, ai ‘Hammer-headed shark’- Kie-Pakia ‘The place ‘Bright Red — Shark], the place ‘Hammer-headed shark—Bright Red—Shark’ can describe one of the places associated with the god Tangaroa (Rjabchikov 1996b:257).

L. M. Ermakova, in cooperation with Ü. Sirk, have distinguished some Austronesian elements in archaic Japanese poetry and religion (Ermakova 1995:144-8; 166); the interpretation of these data was made by the author (Rjabchikov 1996a:15-6). This notice is a continuation of the research of the Japanese-Rapanui parallels. In a Japanese record of ancient matters, Nihon syoki (Ermakova and Meshcheryakov, 1995:144-8; 166).
1997:182-3; 431) there is a strange passage: a whale having the obscure epithet isukupasi is situated on a high hill. The term isukupasi can be split into two words isuku (cf. Rapanui hiku 'caudal fin'); or isuku is equal to isi-ku, i-suku, i-su-kii) and pasi (cf. Rapanui paki(a) 'shark; seal'), and the idea 'above' is connected with the rising sun in eastern Polynesian religion (Barthel 1978:36).

On the other hand, the Austronesian tribe of fishermen of archaic Japan worshipped the sea god Vatautumi-no kami (Ermakova and Meshcheryakov 1994:137-8); and this name consists, in particular, of the words vata (cf. Maori whata 'to elevate'), Rapanui hata 'to elevate' in rongorongo and place-names) and tuumi (cf. Samoan tumutumu 'top; peak, height, zenith'). In Polynesian beliefs Tuumi is a specific name of Tangaroa (lit. 'The Big Man'), compare P.H. Buck's (1938:69) remark that once this deity breathed into the rock foundation the essence of himself and personified it as Tuumu-nui to be the husband. Tuumu-nui or The Great Source describes the origin of the nature in Tuamotuan mythology (Buck 1938:187). Thus archaic Japanese religion included some features that correlate with those of Polynesia.

FOOTNOTES

1Makemake is the sun god; cf. Rarotongan makemake 'light' (Fedorova 1978:20); Tangaroa is a symbol of the sun both in the western Polynesian mythology (Polinskaya 1986:131) and in the Rapanui folklore text "Apa" (Rjabchikov 1996a:6).

2The tunny is an incarnation of Tangaroa (Fedorova 1978:24).

3 Cf. Rapanui amo 'to clear up (about the sky)', Japanese ama 'sky'.

4 Cf. Rapanui mea 'red', Samoan mea 'genitals'.

5 The Small Santiago Tablet (Gr 2) contains the following record which is presented in the beginning of a genealogy characterized by occurrences of the word 48-15 uri 'son': 12 11 72 48-15 16 Hika poki manu uri Kahi, i.e. 'Rongo, the son of Tangaroa'. I took into account that it is well known such beginning of the genealogy: Tangaroa (Arki) as a father, and Rongo (Rongo-Rongo-a-Tangaroa) as his son (Métraux 1940:127). The site Orongo named for the god Rongo (Fedorova 1977:59) was the place where puberty rites were performed in December (month Koro) and were associated with the solstice (Métraux 1940:105-6). Cf. Maori hikahika 'ceremony performed over a new-born child', Rapanui poki manu 'puberty rites' [poki 'child', manu 'bird'], Maori uri 'progeny, offspring'.

71. K. Fedorova (1978: 339) has translated the name Tangaroa (in form of Tanga Roa) as 'The Large Fellow'.
